Showcasing paths to regional economic growth and the use of European Territorial Evidence

The rural parts of Latvia and the regions of Greater Manchester, UK, North Jutland, Denmark, and the Balearic Islands, Spain all have good experiences to share on how to develop regional economy based on innovation and knowledge. Their different paths are showcased to policy makers across the EU at the ESPON Open Seminar on 13-14 June 2012 in Aalborg, organised in collaboration with the Danish Presidency of the Council of the European Union.

Today, European rural regions face more difficult challenges than urban areas. At the same time, rural areas are becoming more diverse. This makes the identification of rural potentials a challenging, yet exciting endeavour. However, quantitative data and evidence is important when seeking to identify an area's territorial capital and inform policy decisions. There has been much discussion about the need to find a means to identify the intangible assets of territorial capital. This will need accessing more qualitative and tacit types of rural knowledge often possessed by regional and local stakeholders.

Visvaldis Valtensbergs, (Associated Professor, Vidzeme University of Applied Sciences, Latvia) is presenting at the Open Seminar Case Easter Europe Identifying the Territorial Potentials of Rural Regions.

The Open Seminar "European Territorial Evidence for EU Cohesion Policy and Programming", organised by ESPON, focuses sharply on how European territorial evidence can inform the future result-oriented regional development policy in Europe.

The ESPON Open Seminar is taking place during the negotiating period for the EU's future cohesion policy and is aimed at assisting national and regional authorities in their operational programmes for 2014-2020. Peter Mehlbye, Director of the ESPON Coordination Unit, said, "In the year of the tenth anniversary of ESPON, the supply of European-wide comparable evidence and tools for policy-making has matured substantially giving the possibility to benchmark and see new development opportunities from the European context".

The ESPON Open Seminar addresses how territorial evidence can be used in relation to the coming thematic objectives of the EU's "Common Strategic Framework" (CSF), and how ESPON evidence and tools support a territorial dimension in the programming within the future EU Cohesion Policy. The key target groups of the event are policy makers, practitioners, managing authorities and programme secretariats currently working on the evidence base needed for the inclusion of a stronger territorial dimension in future programmes.

Policy makers and practitioners are able share their experience and discuss the use of territorial evidence as well as new approaches in developing European regions and cities. Against this backdrop, the ESPON Open Seminar has a double scope:

- Day one: the topic of “Creative Regions of Innovation and Knowledge” is addressed, stimulating a wide-ranging discussion on participants’ concrete experiences related to territorial trends and evidence from ESPON projects.
- Day two: the event is structured around the thematic objectives of future Structural Funds. In a series of workshops dealing with the thematic priorities of the “Common Strategic Framework”, researchers and experts are presenting territorial evidence that supports policy-makers and stakeholders in executing proposals in their specific policy area. The ESPON Open Seminar also offers insights on the tools, indicators and data made available by ESPON.
